FRAUD WATCH from AARP

What to do if you're email gets hacked

You may discover a breach only when your login is rejected, your password changes unexpectedly, an unknown device accesses the account, messages appear that you didn't send or a friend receives a strange email from you. However the hack is confirmed, the top priority is regaining control of your account, Grobman says. Take these steps:

1. Alert your email provider. If you can't access the account, ask for a temporary password. "Almost every email service will have some process if your email is compromised, and they will work to authenticate you," Grobman says (here are options for Google's Gmail, Outlook and Yahoo).

2. Change the password. If you can access the account, change the password immediately. Then change the passwords for your other accounts. "Think of it from a triage perspective," Grobman says. "Start with email, finances, medical, social media, then everything else. Getting your email back under control is the first thing you want to do."

3. Sign out of all devices. Apple, Google and Microsoft all have settings that let you sign out of all your devices from one device. "That way, anyone who's logged in to your account on another device will get kicked out," according to the Federal Trade Commission.

4. Warn your contacts. Alert people on your contact lists about the hack and advise them to ignore any requests from your email address (and not to click links or download files). "Tell the people that you communicate with regularly,
